Chop, designed by the Italian designer LucidiPevere Studio, is a different chopping knife that brings a bit more fun into cooking. Back in the Game

Stephen Pearce, one of Ireland's favourite designers, is back making his iconic pottery. After a sabbatical of two years – due to economic pressures – leading suppliers across the country are receiving their first orders. At its height, Stephen Pearce Pottery produced 450 designs which included kitchenware, lamps, vases and one off pieces. His signature Terracotta range, with its distinctive earthenware colour and white glaze, will sell alongside his father's perennially popular black and white Shanagarry range. "My journey over the last two years where I lost the business has been well documented and now it's time to concentrate on what I do best, making pots. I'm delighted to be back and have found solace in the fact that so many people have continuously looked to buy my pottery. Thankfully now they can. I've noticed people now demand quality and value for money above all else if they can buy Irish, all the better. My products are 100 percent organic – the clay comes from land close to my home here in East Cork – and we take great care in designing the pottery, finishing it and packaging it."
